Historical Note

Teacher education at OSU began in 1909 under the direction of the Department of Industrial Pedagogy. By 1918, OSU was designated by the State Board of Vocational Education to prepare teachers in vocational subjects. In 1932, an administrative reorganization expanded the School of Education to include preparing students to teach in the biological and physical sciences, agriculture, mathematics, home economics, industrial arts, secretarial science, or for educational and vocational guidance. In 1962, a Doctorate of Philosophy in Education was first offered by the School.

Gale Bentz of the Oregon City Public Schools and George J. Brown of Southwest Missouri State College were visiting staff for the 1962 Graduate Summer School Program for Industrial Arts and Trade and Industrial Education Teachers at Oregon State University. Charles Easley was a graduate student industrial education who completed his thesis in 1963. Raymond Cherry, from Lockport (Illinois) Township High School was also visiting staff for the 1962 graduate program.

Content Description

The School of Education Photographs consist of b/w photographic prints of the industrial education summer picnic, the industrial education laboratories, and a meeting of the School of Education faculty. Five of the images in the collection are of the industrial education summer picnic in 1962 at Avery Park in Corvallis and depict Gale Bentz, George J. Brown, Charles Easley, James Grossnicklaus, George Hobbs, and George Warren.

Three of the images show industrial education laboratories with Raymond Cherry and John Wirth demonstrating the use of equipment.

One image depicts School of Education faculty Theodore Yerian and Isabella F. McQuesten presiding over a planning meeting for the newly established Vocational, Adult, and Community College Division in the School of Education in about 1967.
